The Chinese Communist Government is attempting to consolidate the various minority racial groups throughout the country and to strengthen their education in political policy and thought. The Government is now training large numbers of cadres from minority racial groups and is building up the foundation for regional racial self-government and racial coalition in democratic government. The Commission of the Affairs of Nationalities and the Ministry of Education in the winter of 1950-51 jointly began to develop and organize minority race academies and to establish minority race political study classes in the various political universities for the purpose of training large numbers of cadres from the minority racial groups. They plan to train about 100,000 such people before the end of 1952.

Seven minority race academies have already been established. One of these, the Central Minority Race Academy, has been placed directly under the control of the Ministry of Education, while the others are under the joint control of the local Committees of the Affairs of Nationalities and the Departments of Education of the Military and Administrative Committees concerned. Study classes will be established in various political universities according to actual needs; to date only the South China College of Canton and the Revolutionary College of Kwangsi have established such courses. Training of Korean and Mongolian Racial Self-government cadres is being undertaken by the Central Minority Race Academy.

The seven Minority Race Academies now established are:

1. Central Minority Race Academy at Peking. The president is WU Lan-fu (烏蘭夫) and the vice presidents are LIU Ko-p'ing (劉格平) and LIU Ch'un (劉春). This school has about 3000 students. They are minority race self-government cadres of middle-grade (sic) and above.¹
2. Northwest Minority Race Academy at Sian. The president is WU Hung-pin (吳鴻賓) and the vice presidents are SUN Tien-ts'ai (孫殿才) and SHAN Jao (善德). This school has about 1600 students who are Mohammedans.
